Steel Expands

(Continued from page one) the new tubing joint has these space-strength advantages over existing types of joints Williams said: The buttress thread design is applied to plain end, non-upset tubing; Pipe and couplings can be stabbed together on normal drop impact without thread damage or cross-threading, much the same way a freight train is coupled.

Maximum well clearance is provided, featuring full inside diameter to assure maximum flow; the new design allows for simplified field handling, for instance, pipe can be easily rethreaded in the field; pipe-coupling joints can be made up and broken in the field a minimum of 12 times without thread damage. Joint strength is about 98 per cent of pipe body strength; Buttress threads in couplings are tin plated to assure maximum protection against leakage.

"The development of buttress-thread tubing gives America another new tool for greater efficiency in the vital petroleum industry. It provides a highly efficient, economical joint that allows greater clearance between tubing and casing in multiple completion oil wells," Williams said.

Multiple completion means housing two or more strings of tubing in a single well casing. Each tube leads to different oil pockets.

The new development reflects the oil industry's efforts to attain deeper well depths in the face of higher formation pressures.

Prior to the buttress thread application, tube ends had to be upset in order to have the joint strength equal the tube body strength.

The Torrance plant, headed by E. C. Kenyon, general superintendent, employs 649 people locally. Founded in 1916, the Torrance plant is the only steel producing mill in Southern California.
